Felony Justice: an Organizational Analysis of Criminal Courts James and Jacob, Herbert Eisenstein

"Much of what the general and professional public believes to be true about criminal courts is not. The judge does not always play a dominant role. Plea bargaining is not universally prevalent; it does not lead to distinctively lighter sentences than bench or jury trials. Sentencing disparities within cities are not a fundamental problem. Blacks are not treated worse than whites; public defenders are not less effective than retained counsel; jailed defendants are not consistently convicted more often than those who win their release before trial. Defendants who escape conviction do not escape all punishment. Justice delayed is not necessarily justice denied. "... Unlike many studies of trial courts or the criminal process, ours does not focus on a single participant. In our view, what judges, prosecutors, defense counsel, and others do depends heavily on how they interact with one another. None works alone." - from the Preface
